

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

My first round of acknowledgements is reserved for those I met and worked with in Ghana. Rastafarian respect to my assistant and brother Collins Jamson, whose support was invaluable to me while I was living in Peki. His guidance, friendship, advice and company allowed me to hit the ground running. I would not have been able to make much sense of life and death in Peki without his hard work and commitment. I would also like to thank Christine Keil who accompanied me on my very first trip to Ghana and helped me to get to know the country while managing the pains and joys of travelling with upset stomachs. Thanks to Gabriel Kläger's advice, I found a temporary home and base at the house of Auntie Asiedou in Accra, which I could not have been more grateful for. Thank you Auntie and Dinah! Big thanks also to Bob and Jacqueline from Root Yard in Peki, who have been an equally invaluable temporary base and support. I would like to thank the Dadi family in Dzake, who took me into their house for my initial two months in town and supported me with explanations and home-cooked Ghanaian food. Thank you to Peacemaker for allowing me to stay in your family house in Afeviofe, a wonderful home away from home. I would also like to thank everyone who took the time to include me into their daily work routines, invite me to a relative's funeral and answer my incessant questions. This work is based on collaborative research and exchange in 'the field'.

My second round of acknowledgements concerns my academic colleagues. This book is indebted to the advice, guidance and support of Hans Peter Hahn of Goethe University in Frankfurt and Susanne Küchler of the Department of Anthropology at University College London. The DFG-funded graduate training group Value and Equivalence at Goethe University in Frankfurt was my academic home for the longest period of my research and writing time and provided a safe base from which to take my first steps into the field and the academic world. A cohort of wonderful colleagues made the inevitable loneliness of the desk seem a lot lighter, while the institutional frame of the research group was an extremely helpful platform for planning trips, conferences and publications, as well as the short film Now I Am Dead (Bredenbröker and Bergmann, 2020), shot in Peki and produced in collaboration with Phila Bergmann. The film was kindly funded by the DFG and ZIAF (the Centre for Interdisciplinary Africa Research at Goethe University in Frankfurt). My current DFG-funded Walter Benjamin postdoctoral fellowship, during which I am pursuing a research project entitled ‘Queering the Museum? An Anthropological Toolkit for Intersectional Relations in the Arts’ at Humboldt Universität zu Berlin (Hermann von Helmholtz-Zentrum für Kulturtechnik) offered me the time and funding to complete the manuscript and last edits of this book, for which I am deeply grateful. The success of this DFG application was helped by the critical feedback and input from Sharon Macdonald, Birgit Meyer and Michi Knecht. I thank the UCL Department of Anthropology, where I had the chance to benefit from an associate research fellowship, offering a great environment for developing ideas for this book and receiving feedback on them. Susanne Küchler’s priceless advice was crucial in establishing the theoretical background and drawing up the main arguments of this book. I would also particularly like to thank Susanne for agreeing to give input across national borders and institutional walls. Furthermore, I’d like to thank Lucy Norris for comments on an early draft. I am beyond grateful to Birgit Meyer of Religious Matters at Utrecht University for input on Ewe religion and colonial history in Peki. As editor of this series, Birgit provided fantastic, detailed feedback to the book manuscript. I am extremely thankful for the time she devoted and the positive energy she contributed, both of which were a great support! I thank my peers and colleagues Kim Glück, Daniel Gottlieb, Yanti Hölzchen, Friedemann Yi-Neumann, Eva Quansah, Andreas Streinzer and Kirsty Wissing for reading and exchanging ideas during our formative predoctoral years. Thank you to Mareike Späth at the Hanover State Museum for offering a space in which my ideas for the book could take shape and for eating a lot of Spaghettieis with me while sharing a house in Frankfurt. This kept me sane during the early stages of this research. A special thank you to Rob Knowles for reading the introduction of the manuscript post-review edits – I owe you a few Schorles. Thank you also to the very supportive Ethnographic Circle organized by Mirco Göpfert and Catherine Whittaker at Goethe University, which provided a safe and productive environment for discussing work in progress and gathering feedback. A special thank you to Kokou Azamede at Lomé University who kindly hosted me in Lomé and shared his knowledge about the history of Ewe Christianization. I would also particularly like to thank the university library open access funds of Goethe University and Humboldt University for sharing the costs of the open access publication of this book. This funding is particularly important as easy access to books in Ghana is still not a given and an open access publication may reach more readers there and elsewhere. Last but not least, I thank the anonymous reviewers who provided impulses for refining the manuscript, and the editors at Berghahn for seeing me through the process of publishing my first academic monograph.

Finally, my love and gratitude go to my parents Irene and Michael for being supportive throughout the ups and downs of academic work. Love and more love to Adam Pultz Melbye for motivating me every step of the writing and editing way and for providing great feedback on the manuscript, which put the themes of failure and resistance on my mind. Thank you, too, for forcing me to watch Midsommar, a terrible movie. This book and the necessary self-discipline for writing it would not have existed without the help, company, friendship and good spirits of my Ghanaian dog Faustus and my German dog Rosa.
