

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The research and writing that went into this project were supported by the following: the École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales, the University of East Anglia, the Groupe de Recherche et d'Échanges Technologiques, the Centre Asie du Sud-Est and the École française d'Extrême-Orient (EFEO). Thanks to each of these institutions for their generous support on many fronts.

Portions of the work that follows have appeared in various forms. An earlier version of chapter 4 appeared in 'Embodying and Fashioning Headship: A Day in the Life of a Village Headman in the Center of Myanmar', Hau: Journal of Ethnographic Theory 12(2) (2022). Portions of chapter 5 were published in 'Nobody Owns the Land: How Inheritance Shapes Land Relations in the Central Plain of Myanmar', Journal of Burma Studies 24(1) (2020). An earlier version of chapter 6 appeared in 'La grandeur des lu-gyi: Affaires villageoises et formes d'engagement dans le centre du Myanmar', Péninsule 79(2) (2019). I want to thank Hans Steinmüller and Dolores Martinez, editors of the Asian Anthropology series, three anonymous peer reviewers, and the editors at Berghahn Books for their trust and support in publishing the book.

This work owes a lot to the people I encountered on this journey, and more than anyone else to the people of Gawgyi. During my doctoral years, I benefitted immensely from the support of Thomas Sikor, Ben Jones, Oliver Springate-Baginski and Pierre-Yves Le Meur. I would like to give particular thanks to Rik Habraken and Luis Paolo da Silva for their camaraderie during our years at UEA. I also want to thank Mandy Sadan and Michel Naepels who offered me judicious ideas to improve my research beyond its doctoral form.

Thanks to Maxime Boutry, who gave the best introduction to everyday life in Yangon and since then has become an invaluable friend, teacher and colleague. I would like to thank Céline Allaverdian for her constant trust, and all the members of GRET in Myanmar for their help. Special thanks go to Bénédicte Brac de la Perrière who, since she read my first article, continued to discuss my work at length. I owe her a debt of gratitude. I found at CASE in Paris an extraordinary research atmosphere and would like to thank all of its members for their support and friendship, especially Paul Sorrentino and Vanina Bouté. Thanks to Martin Michalon who kindly created the maps I imagined for this book. Special thanks to my dear friend Andrew Mayer who read this work in various forms and skilfully helped me to edit and improve the writing. Jacques Leider, François Robinne and Guillaume Rozenberg have been diligent readers of parts of this work, while Alexandra de Mersan kindly entrusted me to teach the Myanmar Anthropology course at INALCO for two years. The wider world of Burma/Myanmar scholarship, both in Myanmar and worldwide, has also been instrumental in helping me to find ways forward at key moments, whether in the form of advice, comments, contacts or suggestions of relevant literature. Thanks to Elliott Prasse-Freeman who suggested the expression ‘calibrated engagement’, a suggestion that made its way to the very title of my book. Thanks also to my Burmese teachers in Myanmar and in France who helped me to improve my country accent. Thanks to Laur Kiik, who always – unwittingly – reminds me of the power of anthropological imagination.

Above all, thanks to my parents, to my sister Mylène, to my brother Johann, to Isha and Joseph.
